

The Politics and Policy of Transnational Challenges

The study of politics has always reflected the distinction between the 'domestic' and the 'international' space. The former being traditionally the object of investigation for scholars interested on party politics, electoral behavior, policy analysis; while the study of the political dynamics that take place at the supranational level gathered expert in the study of the latter. Such a division of labor, though contested and reconfigured by the emergence of sub-fields such as Foreign policy analysis or International political economy, is still rooted in contemporary Political Science. Yet, global issues are increasingly transnational. Even in a period in which 'globalization' is questioned and sometimes repudiated, political conflicts are unlikely to be once again enclosed within national borders. The cases in point are several. While the Pandemic - its management and the political economy of vaccines - constitutes a recent disruptive example, the economic and financial implications of globalization represent the most consolidated research field focused on the subtle national/supranational divide; similarly, the institutions created at the international level for the promotion of policies aimed at coping with the global warming and its effects constitute a permanent policy arena for both states, corporations, environmental groups and movements. Another area in which policy and politics transcend national boundaries is that of security, since economic and technology policies are increasingly included in this domain, and effective responses can no longer be purely national, as illustrated by the management of cyber and bacteriological threats. The same holds concerning crime and justice, whose implications and management "force" States to cooperate to increase the effectiveness of policy responses. Migration is another issue in which, despite the willingness of 'taking back control' pursued by several governments, conflicts and decision making are likely to be played internationally, and several other examples of highly relevant political arenas can be made.

The conference The Politics and Policy of Transnational Challenges hosts political scientists whose contributions (papers and/or presentations) address relevant contemporary issues where the transnational dimension of governance structures, policy regimes and political processes is a key feature. Contributions can be both theoretical or empirical and vary in epistemological and methodological terms.
